

Five Davis countyans received citations last Wednesday night for their work in furthering soil conservation work. They included (from left) Roy Stookesberry, a Bloomfield city employee who also farms; Mrs. J. Paul Wilcox, who took over the family farm operation after the death of her husband; and Eddie Birchmier, who was honored for his conservation work along with his father, Jacob, who was not present for the picture. Also receiving a citation was Bob Norberg, editor of the Bloomfield Newspapers, whose interest in conservation progress was noted. The awards came from the Davis County Soil Conservation District and were awarded at the annual banquet.

Honors won in the annual Soil Conservation Achievement Contest were bestowed on winners last Wednesday at the annual soil district banquet here. Winners include (from left) Don Walley, tenant, and E. V. Christy, landlord, winners of the landlord-tenant division; Raymond Howard, winner of the owner-operator division; and (not pictured) Marion Roberts, winner of the new cooperator division. The engraved plaques were presented by the Bloomfield Newspapers and the framed citations were given by the Des Moines Register and Tribune, sponsor of the state-wide contest. The Walley-Christy farm and the Roberts farm also won regional honors, for which citations were given last Thursday at a banquet in Sigourney.
