

Farm Science Is Practiced—

Concrete Corn Cribs Save Cash

While Ralph Yost of Shell Rock puts a level up against the wall of the new 28,000 bushel corn crib on Tyden farm No. 4, little Richard Mason, son of Joe Mason who now works the farm, watches the builder with a critical eye. In the inset is a similar crib on No. 6, showing how the crib now being completed will look when the building crew is gone. Of concrete block construction, each such crib—most of the Tyden farms have them—have vermin proof floors, electric elevators, and over a period of years prove to be big money savers. (Lock photo, Kayenay engraving)